

Wreck of the Franklin, The

After her husband John has gone to sea and she loses her only child, Wat, San Diego resident Dolly Branican goes mad. When she recovers, four years later, she discovers that her husband's ship was lost at sea. As heir to a substantial fortune during her madness, Dolly uses these resources to finance the discovery of the whereabouts of her husband's ship, the Franklin, because she doesn't believe he is dead. Years later a clue to the fate of the Franklin is discovered in Australia, Dolly quickly goes to there to discover that her husband may still be alive in a remote part of northwestern Australia.

All yet-to-be discovered artifacts from HMS Erebus and HMS Terror along with the wrecks will now be jointly owned by Canada and Inuit. HMS Terror and Franklin's flagship, HMS Erebus, were abandoned in heavy sea ice far to the north of the eventual wreck site in 1848, during the expedition. Ownership of the wrecks of the HMS Terror and HMS Erebus, the two vessels commanded by Sir John Franklin on his doomed expedition to the Arctic, and Ottawa and Britain have been in formal talks since May 2016 over transferring ownership of the Franklin expedition wrecks to Canada. A deal was struck in September 2014 after a long search. For their next voyage to the Arctic under Sir John Franklin, both Erebus and Terror were outfitted with steam engines from the London and Greenwich. The two ships were part of Sir John Franklin's 1845 quest to find the Northwest Passage. Now that we have the wrecks, it's time to continue with engaging in the search for Sir John Franklin Expedition shipwrecks discovered underwater by a team of Parks Canada discovered the wreck of HMS Erebus, in the south of Ellesmere Island. New details about Sir John Franklin's doomed Arctic expedition continue to be discovered as archeologists examine two sunken wrecks. In 1997, a Franklin 150 expedition was mounted by the Canadian government. The Star was on board the Sir Wilfrid Laurier when the wreck of one of the Franklin Expedition ships was finally found. - 1 min - Uploaded by Parks Canada This is the first underwater video of one of Sir John Franklin's ships that was discovered by Parks Canada. Canada has determined the historic Franklin Expedition shipwreck discovered in the Arctic last month is in fact HMS Erebus, the vessel on which Sir John Franklin's expedition was based. Archaeologists are back at the site of the HMS Terror, a long-sought shipwreck from the Franklin Expedition that went missing in Arctic Canada. Sir John Franklin's flagship the Erebus will soon be home to one of the largest and most complex archeological excavations Canada has ever undertaken. The Wreck of the Franklin (Paperback) by Jules Verne and a great selection of similar Used, New and Collectible Books available now at Amazon.com. Two years after the discovery of the Franklin Expedition's Erebus, the Terror has also been found. Its discovery is forcing a rethink of the